

THE SUN, SUNDAY, JULY 27, 1919.

Copyright, 1919, by the Sun Printing and Publishing Association.

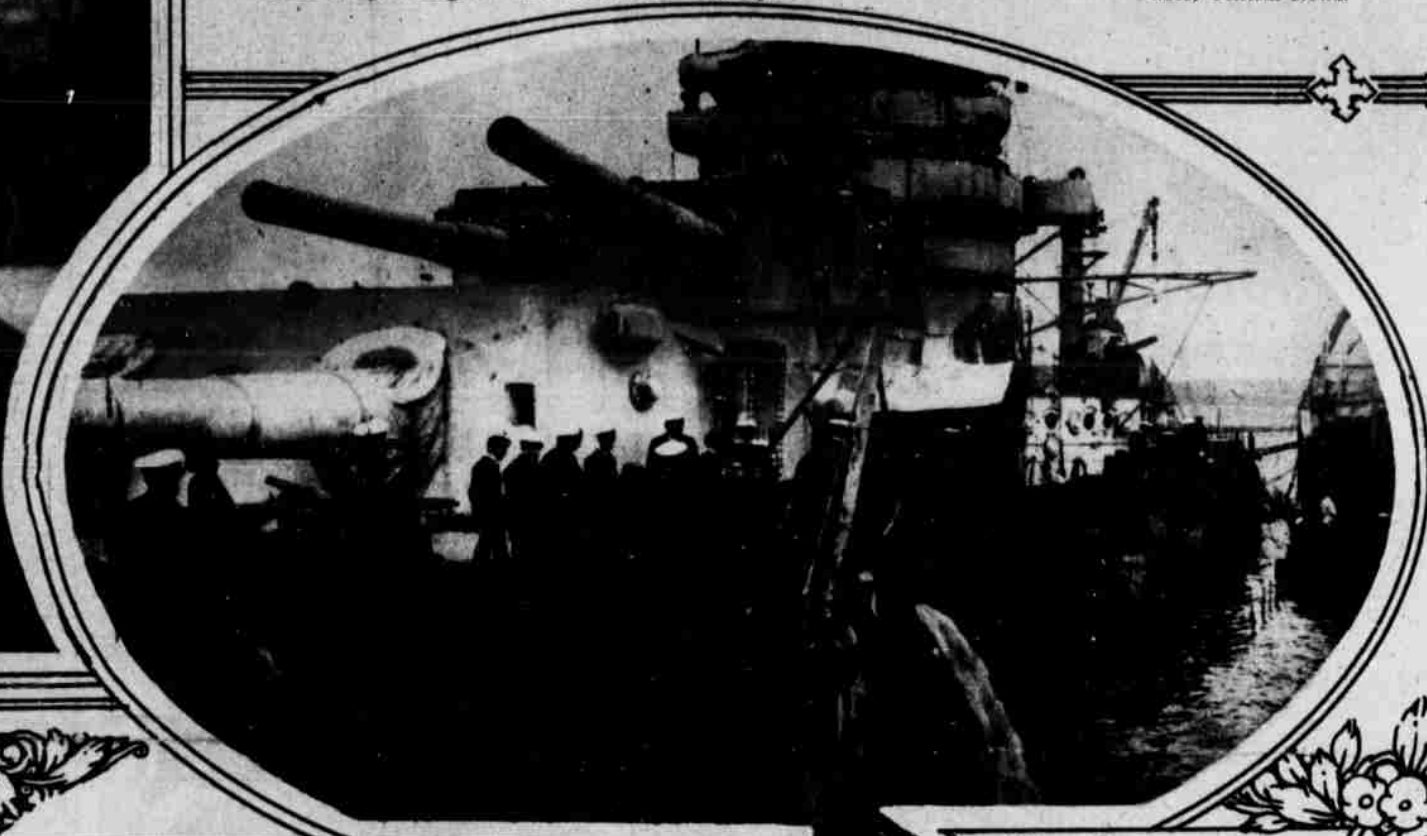

The pilot house of the R-34. This is the only photograph which was taken of the great airship's most important compartment, where Major Scott, the commander, was stationed, while she was in this country. It isn't very much unlike the pilot house of a steamship in appearance.

Photo by C. Curtis.

The luxurious interior of the cabin on one of the Italian Government's dirigibles which make daily trips between Rome, Milan and Turin. Note the spyglass slung at the sides so passengers can view the scenery.

Photo, Central News.

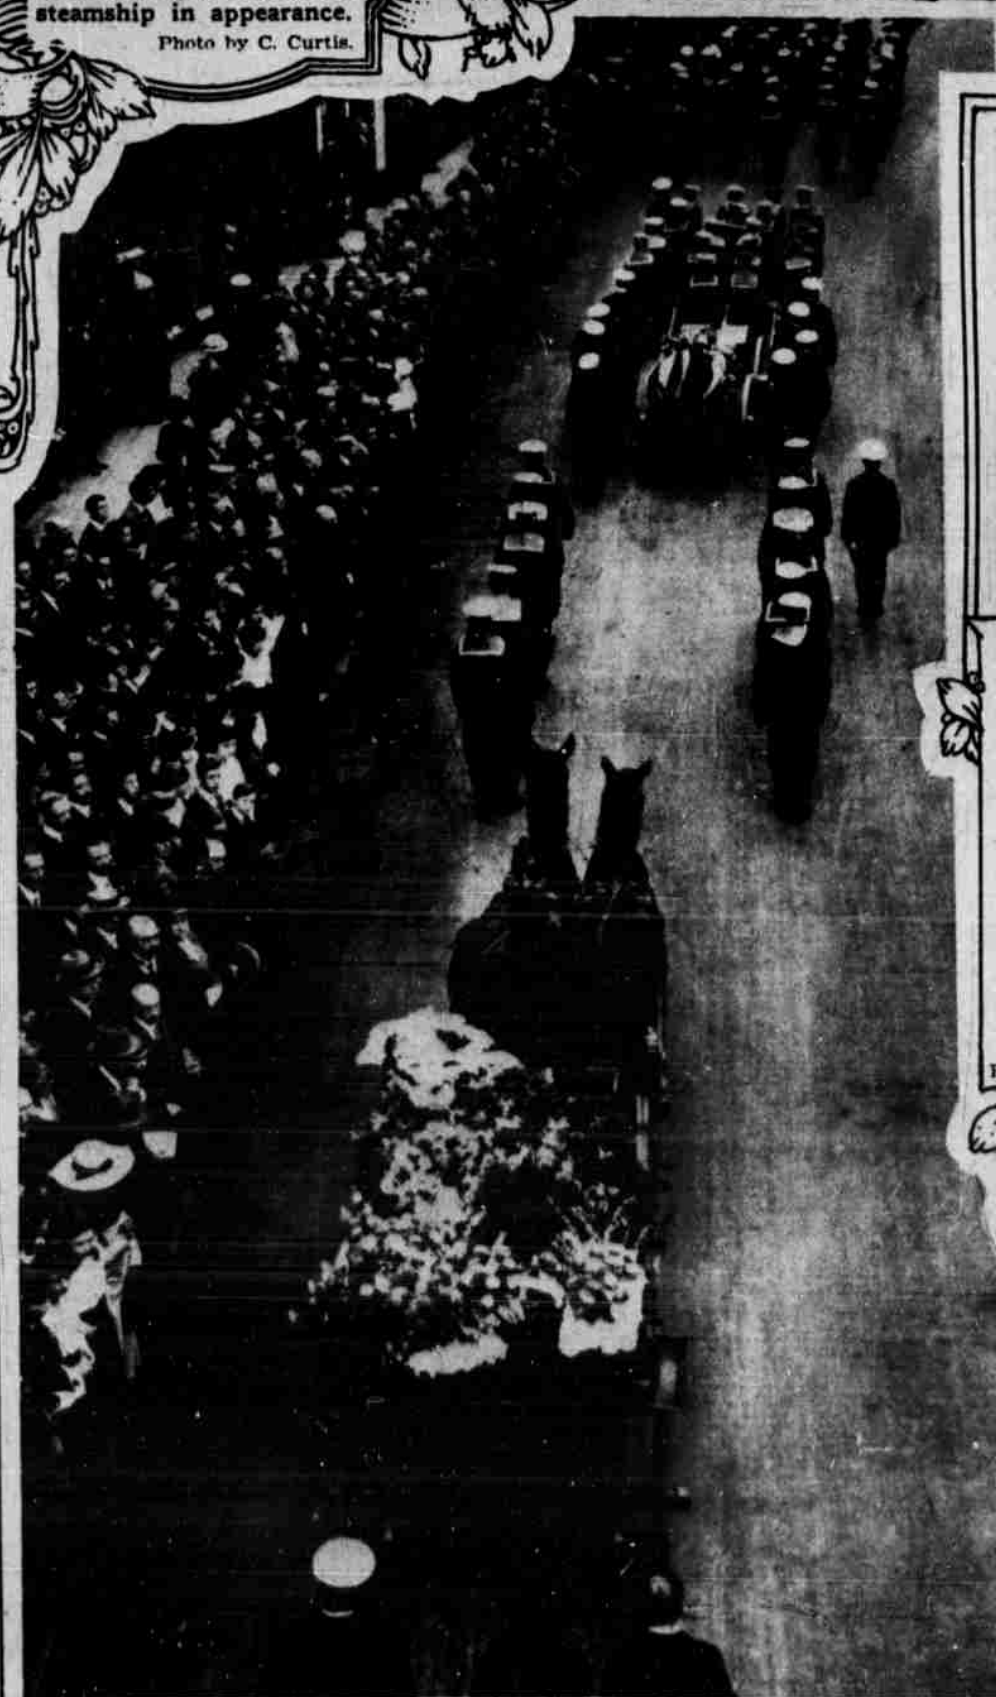

The German navy outwitted the British by scuttling the warships interned at Scapa Flow, but in some cases they didn't do the job thoroughly. It will be possible to salvage most of the vessels. Here is one in the process of being refloated.

Photo, International Film Service.

A recent view of St. Mark's Square in Venice, to which the pigeons have returned. There aren't many tourists to feed the birds and the natives are taking care of them. When the Austrians bombarded the city the feathered inhabitants disappeared.

Photo, Press Illustrating Service.

England paid great honor to the memory of Capt. Charles Fryatt when his body was brought home from Germany. He was executed because a steamship he commanded attempted to ram a U-boat. He was captured a year after the event. The case excited international interest.

Copyright, Central News Service.

The use of the battle field "pill box" against burglars is the very latest wrinkle in the development of the protection of banks. The Pullman Trust and Savings Bank of Chicago has installed the device, as shown above. It is manned by ex-soldiers and guards the outside too.

Photo from Underwood & Underwood.